Warning of incendiary devices in mail

Counter Terrorism Policing is warning couriers and delivery companies to refresh their mail-screening policies and training after a series of incendiary devices was sent via mail throughout the UK. Designed to ignite and burn during transit, one of these devices was recently returned to a warehouse where, as it was being processed, staff noticed the package showed signs of fire damage.

This recent spate of devices being has prompted security experts working for the National Counter Terrorism Security Office to advise couriers and delivery companies to issue guidance to their staff. Details of the advice are here.
